

The 33rd OFEK International Group Relations Conference

BETWEEN INSIDE AND OUTSIDE

Navigating Authority and Leadership

16-21 February 2020 | Zichron Yaakov, Israel

In association with
TAVISTOCK INSTITUTE®

Dear Prospective Participant,

In today's world, we belong to numerous networks and communities, spanning social, cultural and geographic borders. Traditional boundaries are shifting and identity is more complex. While this expands our possibilities, it also creates uncertainty and raises questions about our sense of place.

Are we on the inside? The outside? Both? Where do we position ourselves or get placed by others and from where do we find our voice? What about when our work team is spread across several countries but we sit among people with whom we have no common task? Or with recent political trends, where we may not feel represented by elected leadership and find ourselves alienated, disenfranchised, outside? Who has the privilege or credentials for being in and who is left out? And from which parts of our multiple identities can we operate?

This has a significant impact on authority, leadership and followership. With hierarchies reordering, boundaries uncertain or diffuse, and the insider-outsider dilemmas more prevalent and pressing, we are required to find and take up authority and leadership differently. How do we navigate all of this in a new and effective way? How do we better understand our roles in order to engage in society and play our part?

We invite you to join us at the 33rd OFEK International Group Relations Conference to explore these and other questions. The conference is an experiential learning event that provides a unique opportunity to study one's own behavior as it is happens in real time, to think and reflect and to try out new ways of being and acting in a safe setting removed from the pressures of daily life. Participants and staff take up a variety of roles and examine the exercise of authority and leadership in relation to the experience of being inside, outside and on the peripheries. The insights gained from this kind of learning can be powerful and long lasting. And, as a participant from a previous conference has observed, "Israel remains an unusually fertile ground for introspection and deep reflection." The conference takes place in the tranquil setting of the Eden Inn Hotel in Zichron Yaakov, a small town overlooking the Mediterranean.

We look forward to seeing you there.

Leila Djemal, Conference Director

What is a Group Relations Conference?

Organizations conduct themselves not only according to stated tasks, but often under the influence of group and systemic processes, both overt and covert, rational and irrational, that have a crucial impact on their life, culture and effectiveness. A Group Relations conference aims to study and investigate these processes at the level of the group, the organization and the wider social context.

The conference, in which both participants and staff come from a wide range of professions and cultures, provides opportunities to:

- Discover the unspoken and at times unconscious feelings and processes that are often put aside in our everyday working life and buried under the drive to fulfill formal tasks;
- Better understand the hidden assumptions, fantasies and irrational forces that help shape group and organizational life and the way we use our authority and take up our roles;

- Learn about what supports or detracts from our effectiveness;
- Use the potential within us to bring about changes in the way we work and influence our surroundings.

The learning in the conference is experiential, modeled after the 'Tavistock' working conferences. There are no lectures or theoretical discussions. Rather, we form a temporary learning organization where the topics and issues arising in the conference are studied as they evolve, here and now and in real time. The work in the conference opens a window into the emotional and unconscious layers that are an integral part of our behavior in all spheres of life.

Who is the Conference for?

All of us live and work in groups and organizations, from our earliest family groupings to our social and professional communities. A Group Relations Conference is for anyone interested in how they and their groups, teams or organizations can work better, as well as in expanding their own inner and outer reflective abilities. For example, leaders, managers, entrepreneurs, consultants, HR professionals, coaches, facilitators, therapists, educators, researchers and more. No previous experience is necessary; curiosity and a desire to learn are the only requirements.

If you have been to a Group Relations Conference before, this 'next time around,' in a setting with other experienced participants, can offer a deeper learning about ourselves and particularly about the systemic forces that influence us personally and in the workplace.

What Can We Learn About?

Ourselves: The way we manage ourselves in a group; the way we perceive our identity and sense of place in relation to others; the way we take up our roles in different settings; how we find and take up authority; how we take up formal and informal leadership and followership roles; and the feelings and fantasies that inhibit our leadership potential.

Our organizations: The powerful irrational forces that operate under the surface of our day-to-day work and get in the way of the fulfillment of our organizational tasks and mission; and the way groups interact under the influence of unconscious impulses and drives.

The wider context: The social and political forces that shape our lives, often in ways that we are not aware of; our expectations and assumptions about authority; our ideas about leaders and leadership; and the part we can and do play in the society around us.

Why in Israel and Why Now?

Israel is a compelling setting in which to explore issues of authority and leadership in the context of belonging and sense of place, or being on the inside, on the outside, or on the peripheries. With a large immigrant population Israel is extremely varied ethnically, culturally and religiously and is composed of multiple overlapping communities, including refugee and migrant worker groups, all vying for self-expression and influence. Often in the line of fire by the rest of the world for its military and political decision-making, it is the object of as much fantasy as realistic scrutiny. Its internal struggles with overt and covert forces that shape its complex and diverse identity, its leadership and its culture, mirror similar conflicts experienced by many nations at this fraught moment, making it all the more relevant as a location.

We hope that with our diverse conference staff and a large international conference membership, we will be able to explore together some of the complex rational and irrational, real and imagined attitudes and feelings we have in relation to one another, on a personal, organizational or cultural level.

Language

The working language of the conference is English. However, in groups or situations where everyone speaks Hebrew, the latter can also serve as the working language.
